Don't know what is going to happen. Geraldine called + they were going to come here if the folks were coming. Now I don't know. evening for supper. She said Klaude may be on the Seminary Council. Going to a meeting tomorrow night. Clay rode a bull again and got tossed off.

Bruce called & said Mike Rent is in the hospital again with bleeding ulcers. He said Geraldine told Brenda that Connie told Reid "what has dad done for me?" Geraldine's answer was what did he do for you for 16 yrs?. Connie seems ungrateful. She said Susan buys them hair & body clothes & such. Years ago she bought them clothes & then take them away from them - also she cut their clothes. Probably losing her concession & buying their affection. Michelle said "my brother - sick & sick - meaning Scott & Valerie boys and I said 3 times to her. "they are not your brothers they are cousins". and I got hat under the collar when they say things that is not true. She also called Scott & Val by name not mom & dad. I'll have to remind her who she is.

Brenda doesn't want them now they are adults.

Don't know how it will end. No matter what Bruce does it will be the fault. The girls are his and he can't just shove them out of his life to pacify a [redacted] wife. Some compromise should be made. Hope they can settle the big disagreement. Worry!

Utah recovering from record snow

White stuff may return Wednesday

By PHIL JENSEN

Utah was crawling back to normal today after Monday's record-shattering storm paralyzed much of the state.

Schools, businesses and government offices reopened today and public safety officials were removing most roadblocks to highways shut down by the crippling storm.

SNOWPLOUGH: Plowers try to keep up with snow's pace. 1C

Gov. Mike Leavitt declared a state of emergency Monday afternoon and mobilized the Utah National Guard for snow removal after normal resources were exhausted.

The National Weather Service, which at one point Monday attached its own phones to a recorder because staffers couldn't make it to work, said a welcome respite to the winter of '93 could be at hand.

No snow was in the forecast for today and there is only about a 30 percent chance Wednesday. The long-range forecast through Saturday shows mostly cloudy skies with a chance of snow each day, but nothing like amounts that buried the state over the past week.

Temperatures will remain cold, however. Highs through Saturday should be in the upper 20s and 30s with overnight lows mostly in the teens.

The weather service said Monday's storm dumped between 8 and 12 inches of snow on valley floors from Brigham City south to Point of the Mountain, adding to amounts that already had rewritten January record books.

The storm crippled the transportation system, forced many government agencies to shut down and kept 75 percent of Utah public school students home.

Drifts just keep piling up on East Bench of Ogden

OGDEN — Lynn Jensen pushed and pushed his tiny snow blower against the snow in his driveway, but this was one unequal battle it appeared Goliath was going to win.

The snow was up to 6 feet deep and went all the way across the street. Against that mass, he admitted, he didn't have much of a chance.

Jensen, 2005 S. 1850 East, had just moved into the house Sunday. He liked it for the nice view of the mountain: directly east and unhindered because of a vacant lot across the street.

Unfortunately, that vacant lot also let Sunday night's canyon winds blow all that snow into the road, cutting of 1850 East entirely, the drift aimed right at his driveway.

"It just so happens I'm the only one who can't get out here," he said.

Actually, he had lots of compa-

Leavitt calls out National Guard to help Salt Lake County

By RALPH WAKLEY
Standard-Examiner staff

SALT LAKE CITY — Gov. Mike Leavitt signed an emergency declaration for Salt Lake County on Monday, allowing him to call out the National Guard to help battle record snowfall from a hazardous winter storm and to seek federal financial help.

"The principal emergency is snow removal," said Leavitt before climbing into a National Guard LTV Hummer all-wheel-drive vehicle to tour the Salt Lake Valley, one of the areas hardest hit by five consecutive days of snow and another winter blast on

The major storm officially lasted from 1:10 p.m. on Jan. 6 to 11:05 a.m. Sunday, said Bill Alder, chief meteorologist at the National Weather Service's state office in Salt Lake City. During the period, it dumped a record 23.3 inches of snow on Salt Lake International Airport.

"It was the greatest single snowstorm we've had on the airport's record books," said Alder.

The old single-storm record at the airport was 21.6 inches of snow from a March 12-15 storm in 1944.

After the storm cleared Sunday, "then we got a little shot last night and a bigger shot again today," Alder said Monday, pushing January snowfall at the airport to a record 40.9 inches for the month. The old January record was 32.3 inches back in 1937.

With three weeks left in January, the all-time, one-month snowfall record of 41.9 inches set in March 1979 should easily tumble, Alder said, because more snow may fall Wednesday or Thursday and then during the weekend.

There is some good news, however, said Alder.

"I don't see any warm temperatures" that could result in flooding, he said.

"And it's not going to get bitterly cold" with the storm fronts possible for later this week and the weekend.

"And, it means we're going to have water this summer," Alder said.

One of the big dangers from the storm, said Gene Findlay, outgoing Utah Department of Transportation executive director, "is our crews have been out on a 24-hour basis for a week," typically working 10-hour shifts.

Not only are the approximately 600 UDOT workers who drive the plows reaching the point of exhaustion, Findlay said, "but the equipment also is starting to show its wear" because the mechanics only have time to make emergency repairs.

The National Guard will be helping move the snow around with its 20-ton dump trucks and front-end loaders, said Maj. Gen. John Matthews. Although about 8,000 Utahns serve in the National Guard or Air Guard, "only about 30 to 40 people at any given time" will be helping UDOT or county road crews, said Matthews.

"We'll work our way through this process, trying to solve the problems," said Leavitt.

Persson stunned by arrest

Authorities not fooled, catch fugitive in Tulsa

By ANDY HOWELL
Standard-Examiner Davis Bureau

Bountiful Police Detective Randy Pickett isn't surprised Donald Raymond Persson was caught in the United States, even though he had received a letter from the former school psychologist and child rape suspect postmarked in Hong Kong.

Persson

And the prosecutor and the man who put up Persson's $150,000 bond say they never believed, either, that the fugitive had left the country.

"I had a feeling he had not left the U.S.," Pickett said this morning. "That letter was a red herring."

Persson, 54, was arrested Monday in east Tulsa, Okla., by the FBI and two police officers from Sapulpa, a small town about 12 miles west of Tulsa.

The one-time Davis School District psychologist fled Utah on Sept. 21 after being charged with felony child rape in an alleged assault on a 10-year-old California girl who had been staying with him.

"We knew he was trying to change his identity ... and he couldn't leave the country without doing that," said prosecutor Brian Namba. "I'm sure he was trying to do that in Oklahoma."

During the investigation last year, officials had seized instruction manuals from Persson's Bountiful home on how to create a new identity and the birth certificate of a deceased man who was born the same year as Persson.

Beehive Bail Bonds owner Gary Walton said the capture saves him an expensive legal process of seizing Persson's property, much of it in California, and thousands of dollars in travel expenses.

"For a lot of financial reasons, I'm tickled," he said.

Walton said he was anxiously awaiting the segment on the fugitive to be aired by the television series America's Most Wanted, because he felt it would lead to Persson's capture.

The segment was scheduled to air this month, but producers of the Fox Television show said it has been canceled because of Persson's arrest.

On Nov. 16, Pickett received a one-page typewritten letter he believed was written by Persson. He said it contained information only Persson would know, but he wasn't convinced Persson was in Hong Kong. The letter bore a Hong Kong postmark.

Authorities said Persson spent several years traveling throughout Asia as a salesman and may have eration as long as there is a possibility that oil is inside."

Hurricane-force winds of 75 mph raked across Sumburgh Head, with gusts to 95 mph. Rain, sleet and snow have limited visibility, and lightning during the night caused brief power surges.

The Liberian-registered tanker had run aground at the south tip of Mainland, the largest of the Shetland Islands, after becoming disabled in similarly violent weather.

In the worst spill in U.S. history, more than the 11 million gallons of heavy crude was dumped by the Exxon Valdez into Alaska's Prince William Sound in 1989.

Twenty-foot gushers could be seen spewing from the tankers deck on Monday.

Already the carcasses of more than 700 birds, as well as seals and otters, have washed up on the shores of the island. Fishing grounds and salmon farms were closed by the government.

Miles of green hills are now covered in oily sea spray, crops are contaminated and sheep have been moved away from the coast.

While rescue efforts have focused on animals, those who live on the remote and rocky island have quietly worried about their own health following a week of exposure to oil and chemical dispersants used to break up the spill.

In better times, Shetlanders liked to brag about the clear water and fresh air of their islands.

Drifts

From 1A

ny. The canyon winds, coupled with Sunday night's blizzard, drifted snow deep all along the northern edge of the city west of Ogden Canyon.

Buchanan Avenue, between 22nd Street and 2150 S., was completely buried, with homeowners unable to get their vehicles since Saturday. A persistent drift Monday cut the middle of 1850 East at about 2000 South.

The persistance of the wind could be seen in small things around the homes. Window screens were filled with blown ice, for example, and the inside of Jensen's garage looked as if someone had pumped foam insulation into it — the snow found tiny cracks and billowed in.

Fences buried under snowdrifts were so common as to not be worth pointing out.

Jensen's neighbors to the immediate south were slightly better off. Mary Clausse was out with her two children and one other attacking the heap of snow bravely with shovels.

She'd be happy, she said, if she could clear her driveway and that of Steve Call, across the street from her home. The drift was just a touch north of her driveway, a relatively small three-foot pile blocking her way, and it looked as if they might make it.

"We've had a lot of people drive up and look and go 'Duh!,' " she said. "And the snow plow came and tried to plow it and he couldn't do it."

She said they were hoping for a front end loader or other heavy equipment to dig them out later on.

Call, across the street, had a clear driveway, but in his back yard a huge wave-shaped drift of snow, 8 feet tall, was perched 15 feet from his back door. Drifts are a common thing around there, he said, but "you know, the summers make the winters worthwhile."

Down on Buchanan Avenue things were finally, after a long weekend, looking up.

Two earth movers from the Ogden City Water Department were busily digging out houses between 2150 South and 22nd South. Snow blowing off the naked hills to the east had completely buried the street since Saturday, and homeowners' calls to the city for help went unanswered until Monday.

Jeff Titus, 2181 Buchanan, said the road in front of his house was under such deep drifts he couldn't have gotten out if he wanted to. "I've got a 3-week-old baby and it's lucky we didn't have to," he said.

He and a neighbor, Ben Valpando, 2163 Buchanan Ave., watched as the two dump loaders worked steadily at the snow, heaping it onto piles across the street 10-feet tall. Titus cheered when they dug out his driveway.

Through it all, though, he said one contact with the outside world stayed put: the mail went through.

"He walked it down," Titus said.

Leavitt: No appeal on ruling

Governor to seek new abortion law

Standard-Examiner staff

SALT LAKE CITY — Utah will not appeal a federal judge's decision placing significant restrictions on a 1991 anti-abortion law, Gov. Mike Leavitt said today. But Leavitt said his decision is based on the American Civil Liberties Union also agreeing not to seek a review of the December ruling.

"I will not initiate an appeal of Judge (J. Thomas) Greene's ruling. I ask that the ACLU show similar restraint. It is time that the lawsuits stop," Leavitt said.

His decision came two days after the weekend release of a public opinion poll showing most Utahns want to end the costly legal battle over the law that would have banned virtually all elective abortions. Legislators have said the price tag on the case has exceeded $1.5 million.

Greene said the state law could not apply through the first 20 weeks of a pregnancy. Starting in the 21st week, most of the Utah law then could apply. But state officials have said they could find no recent cases of abortions so late in a pregnancy except where the mother's life was at risk.

Kathryn Kendell, ACLU Utah staff attorney, said the plaintiffs in the suit planned a meeting Wednesday to decide whether an appeal is justified.

Leavitt said Utah's position is it prevailed on seven of the nine provisions in the law "and it is now time that we move forward."

Kendell said even though the state won numerous "minor legal points, it lost the entire reason why they passed the law to restrict abortion. They lost entire issue" when Greene established the 21-week standard.

Instead of an appeal, Leavitt said he will ask the Legislature to draft "the most restrictive abortion law possible," but one that will comply with a recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling in a Pennsylvania case allowing for informed consent and 24-hour waiting periods.

Bentsen says tax increase may be considered

WASHINGTON (AP) — Treasury Secretary-designate Lloyd Bentsen said today tax increases and cuts in popular benefit programs will have to be considered if the government's record budget deficit is to be controlled.

"You have to address entitlements (such as medical and veterans' benefits) along with taxes and fiscal restraint," Bentsen said.

Bentsen, a Texas Democrat testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, which he has headed for six years, also said the deficit will make it more difficult to grant the middle-class tax cut promised by President-elect Clinton.

A tax reduction is "one of the options still being weighed," Bentsen said. Because of the deficit, he added, "the options are going to be tougher than they were."

The committee, while not endorsing those policies, made clear what it thinks of Bentsen. In what may have been an unprecedented accolade, the panel unanimously approved the nomination before Bentsen was asked the first question at his confirmation hearing.

Bentsen cautioned lawmakers they may have to take some risks to bring about Clinton's goal of giving every worker "a personal chance at the American dream."

But Leavitt, who has been governor for only a week, added, "Government will not be able to respond to every need." He urged Utahns to check on their elderly or handicapped neighbors to make sure they have adequate clothing, food and heat.

State emergency management officials also urged Utahns to look at their roofs, to make sure they are not overloaded with snow and that all vent pipes are clear. Covered furnace vents could force poisonous carbon monoxide back into the home.

The governor said his state of emergency declaration will allow Utah officials to apply for federal financial assistance "to help us get caught up" on the money spent plowing out most of Utah's highways and roads.

During the five-day storm, Utah Highway Patrol officials said, four troopers and one corrections department officer were injured trying to help disabled motorists, 17 patrol cars were damaged in traffic accidents on snow-slick roads, and 12,500 motorists were helped.

Hill Air Force and the Ogden IRS Center sent day workers home early Monday and canceled its swing shifts. The Tooele Army Depot also shut down. All were back to normal operations today.

Sixteen school districts involving 75 percent of Utah's 461,000 students closed Monday but all were reported open today. Weber State University and the University of Utah also reopened this morning, along with state government offices, most of which shut their doors Monday.

The Ogden City Mall, which closed Monday, opened for business this morning.

Only a few highways remained closed late this morning, including Interstate 84 from Snowville to the Idaho border.

Utah Highway 89 at the mouth of Weber Canyon reopened this morning after being shut down much of the weekend and Monday due to high winds and drifting snow. That closure blocked the interstate to Morgan County and forced travelers to take alternate routes over Trappers Loop Highway.

Other closures that remained this morning included Provo and American Fork canyons where avalanches blocked the roads, Parowan, Cedar and Indian canyons, Utah 31 from Fairview to Huntington, the highway to Sundance ski resort east of Provo, Utah 191 at the top of Flaming Gorge Reservoir and State Road 264 in Price.

Big and Little Cottonwood canyons leading to ski resorts east of Salt Lake City were closed but officials had hoped to have them cleared and passable by early this afternoon.

Telephone circuits, many of which were interrupted Monday, were back in full operation today, US West reported.

Dispatchers in Northern Utah today reported only one injury accident from Monday's storm, on Interstate 15 in Box Elder County, where the injury was minor.

But in a weather-related tragedy, a 79-year-old South Ogden man, Lester Elmer White, collapsed and died while blowing snow at his home Monday in the 3900 block of Raymond Avenue. He was taken to the McKay-Dee Hospital emergency room, where he was dead on arrival from a heart attack.

The latest storm came on the heels of a five-day blast that dropped up to two feet of snow on valley floors and several more feet in the mountains.

All told, 41 inches of snow has fallen at the Salt Lake International Airport, where the weather service measures official state records, since New Year's Day. The onslaught destroyed a 1937 record for all of January of 32 inches.

So far this winter, 72.5 inches of snow has fallen at the airport, compared to an average of 59.4 inches for an entire winter, the weather service said.

The series of storms exhausted Utah Highway Patrol troopers, many of whom toiled through 16-hour shifts. The UHP reported responding to 650 accidents since Wednesday but only one fatality.

Private motorists weren't the only ones injured as frustrated homeowners struggled against all odds to clear their driveways.

Charges are pending against a West Jordan man who grabbed the driver of a snowplow, which had just blocked his driveway again, by the hair and slapped and punched him. Another snowplow operator in Salt Lake City reported being attacked by a man with a metal pipe.

Restoration: A change of heart

After decades of destroying old buildings, the LDS Church now restores historical gems

By SANDRA DEMCHUK
Standard-Examiner staff

OGDEN — Historians and building preservationists in Utah are a little confused.

Twenty years ago the threat of court action and massive public outcry couldn't stop the LDS Church from bulldozing the Coalville LDS Tabernacle. Now, it seems many buildings of significance to the church are being lavishly restored.

In July alone, the LDS Church reopened two buildings — the St. George LDS Tabernacle and the Joseph Smith Memorial Building (the former Hotel Utah) — on which it spent millions of dollars and years restoring.

What's surprising is that it has taken this long. For a state which loves its pioneer heritage, few original pioneer buildings remain. And the last 20 years haven't been kind to buildings built between 1847 and 1930, said architect Allen Roberts, a partner in the Cooper/Roberts firm in Salt Lake City.

In 1971, following the LDS Church's decision to tear down the Coalville Tabernacle, Roberts set out to document, in writing and photographs, all remaining Mormon buildings in Utah. He spent a four years traveling the state, and in the end, produced a book-length survey of research.

"Since I wrote that survey, one-third of those buildings have been destroyed," Roberts said. Of the 40 tabernacles built in Utah, half have been destroyed. In addition, at least half of the state's early meeting houses and chapels have been razed, he said.

Demolition of the Coalville Tabernacle prompted Roberts to become a restoration architect. Since then, he and his firm have gone on to orchestrate the restoration of [illegible] LDS Church.

In 1983, Cooper/Roberts began working on the Brigham City LDS Tabernacle with the goal of taking it back to its historic appearance, Roberts said. Paint was removed from the exterior brick walls with powerful, sprayed-on chemicals and extensive graining, marbleizing, stenciling and gold-leafing was applied to the interior woods by craftsmen Chuck James and Ron Wheat.

"Everything was painted green when we started so we had to grain over everything," said James, owner of Rocky Mountain Painting in Salt Lake City.

Cooper/Roberts, in what James called a "grand leap of faith," allowed James and Wheat to select the colors and techniques to be applied to the tabernacle's woods.

The project took the painters 2½ months to complete, but James said he feels he did some of his best work during that time because of a little friendly competition he had going with Wheat.

Normally business competitors, Wheat and James came together for this project and "we tried to out do one another all through the job," James said.

James also said he usually sneaks his signature onto the piece he is graining by designing a knot-hole and signing it. "Unfortunately, the architect caught my signature, but instead of being he mad he demanded his own knot-hole. We created knot-holes for everyone after that," James said.

The restoration in the Brigham City Tabernacle involved some architectural sleuthing as crews searched for clues to the building's original features.

"The building had been altered, diminishing the character...," Roberts said. "Part of the work was to reestablish those features."

AUGUST MILLER/Standard-Examiner

Robert Horne of Salt Lake City paints trim on the railing on the mezzanine level of the Joseph Smith Memorial Building (the former Hotel Utah). Workers were putting finishing touches on the building, which has undergone extensive renovation.

Like any exploration, the crews working on the Brigham City Tabernacle occasionally were rewarded with a great find, like when a 20-foot wide, 16-foot tall door was found hidden in part of the [illegible]

"[illegible] panels and we were able to [illegible] different [illegible] that door and put it [illegible] use," Roberts said. [illegible] the Brigham City Tabernacle was "significantly less" than what it would have cost to build a new structure and half as expensive as what it costs to build new LDS stake centers today, he said.

"It is a good example of the church valuing the building enough to restore it carefully. They have done insensitive renovation on some buildings, but I think they're sensitive now on their significant buildings," he said.

But the LDS Church, while seeming to have amended its stance on restoration, hasn't yet adopted an across-the-board policy requiring all historic church-owned buildings be saved. The church focuses on buildings it feels play a key role in the faith's on-going mission, said Don Enders, senior curator for the LDS Church's Museum of Church History and Art.

"There are so many sites that can be considered LDS Church historical sites that it would be impossible to prepare and interpret all of them," Enders said.

A landmarks list, similar to a national register of historic buildings, was compiled long ago by the LDS Church, indicating which buildings the church is "committed" to saving, said Steven Olsen, manager of operations for the LDS Church's Museum of Church History and Art.

This list is used to value a renovation or demolition proposal, Olsen said and those structures on the list are considered to have a "supreme cultural, religious, aesthetic or historical value."

One of the buildings is the St. George Tabernacle in southern Utah reopened this week amid a series of activities culminating today.

Pioneers struggling in the harsh geography and climate of southern Utah began building the tabernacle, designed as a project to give work and sustenance to discouraged workers in 1863. It took 10 years to complete.

Restoration work there started in 1990 when Dennis Patten's St. George architecture team, P.C. Architects, began researching the tabernacle's structural history and creating preliminary construction drawings.

"We began to make an interpretation of what was original (to the building) and then pursued putting the building back into that original state," Patten said.

His team would consult with the LDS Church historical department on some matters and while they received input from many different people, the architects made the decision of what should be done and how, Patten said.

The St. George restoration team found themselves involved in solving their own architectural mysteries.

When paint needed to be mixed to match original shades, turn-of-

Remodeling revitalizes former hotel

SALT LAKE CITY — The restoration work of the former Hotel Utah is some of the most costly and extensive ever undertaken in the state, but calling the project a restoration job is really a misnomer, said one of project's architects.

"The word 'restore' is a bit of architectural jargon, meaning you've brought a site back to its exact, original condition.

"That is not what we did there," said architect Roger Jackson of FFKR Architecture/Planning/Interior Design, the Salt Lake City firm that oversaw the project from its planning through its completion six and half years later.

Jackson said what his firm did could more accurately be called "adaptive reuse." Rather than restoring the building to its former purpose, it was adapted and changed to become something else. Formerly a hotel, most of the building will now be used as office space.

"The idea was to make it a very public building, or as public as a church office building could be. Our instruction was make this building last for another 80 years," he said.

"Everyone wants to use the word restore but that word has a technical meaning. In the strictest sense, the building was not restored. It's architectural details were brought back," Jackson said.

Some areas of the building can more accurately be considered restored if someone's willing to fudge on the word's meaning, but Jackson considers the work, on the whole, "a giant remodeling project."

His firm strived to replicate original features, using traditional methods on some of the hotel's

When Don Enders approaches a historical site with the intent of restoring it he has a plan.

"Anytime you do the restoration of a site, the way you help ensure that you get a good, faithful and accurate project is to exhaust your historical resources. Only then can you do your archaeological excavation and architectural studies," Enders said.

The combination of those three disciplines help you to create the most authentic restoration possible, he said.

Enders is a curator of historic sites and works with the LDS Church, assisting with the historic preservation of the church's structures in the United States. Each time he sets out to restore a site his objective is to make the site as much like it once was, he said.

"We try to do a careful and systematic restoration. The work certainly doesn't move quickly," he said.

Enders current project with the LDS church is Cove Fort, an 1867 fort in central Utah, near Beaver, that has survived intact. He trav-

Proposed ban on proselytizing in Russia subject of criticism

MOSCOW (AP) — Hare Krishnas sell books in the Moscow subway. A placard at a train station advertises a Jehovah's Witnesses' convention. A TV commercial announces the "Festival of Jesus" conducted by a Canadian preacher.

A flood of missionaries has infuriated the Orthodox Church and prompted lawmakers to propose a ban on foreign proselytism. But foreigners and Russians are joining forces against what they call a resurgent "Orthodox lobby."

"Russia is choosing the path of open struggle against pluralism of ideas and beliefs," seven of Russia's major Protestant leaders wrote President Boris Yeltsin in a letter released Monday.

The Russian-American Association for Spiritual Renewal said the law would deny religious liberty for up to 3 million Russian Protestants.

The Supreme Soviet amended Russia's 3-year-old law on religious freedom last week to ban missionary work, publishing and advertising by foreign citizens or religious organizations.

'Russia is choosing the path of open struggle against pluralism of ideas and beliefs.' — Russia's major Protestant lers, in letter to President Boris Yin

The legislation requires foreign religious groups to become affiliated with Russian organizations or to obtain government accreditation.

Yeltsin must sign before it becomes law. The objecting organizations are pressuring him to send it back to the legislature for softening.

But presidential spokesman Anatoly Krasikov said he saw "no reason" for Yeltsin to oppose it.

Sergei Kovalev of the legislature's human rights committee; lawmaker Gleb Yakunin, an Orthodox clergyman, and other critics say the law is discriminatory and may serve only the interes the Moscow patriarchy.

"It was adopted under pressure the Orthodox lobby," said Alexanderiuk, executive secretary of an organiz that unites Baptists in the former Soviaion.

Although the legislation woulde no immediate effect on Firsiuk's comation of Russian citizens, he said, "To they ban foreign Protestant missiona and tomorrow they may ban Pistant churches with the same ease."

The Russian Orthodox Churunder Patriarch Alexy II strongly supts the law. It was drafted by a legislativemmittee on freedom of conscience, hled by Vyacheslav Polosin, an Orthodox priest.

Polosin told reporters Monday that the law corresponded to international norms and will protect Russians from "people with criminal pasts, crooks, fanatics and adventure-seekers" arriving in religious disguises.

"This is not religious freedom but anarchy. Anybody can come here and do whatever he likes, and the state pays no attention."

He complained that foreign missionaries spent thousands for advertising and large meeting halls, while most ordinary Russians suffer economic hardship.

Polosin argued that the measure imposes "obstacles for foreign organizations trying to enlist new members, but Russian groups of any confession can operate freely."

"Let them conquer the flock with the strength of prayer, and not with help from abroad," he said.

Last November, American evangelist Billy Graham — who insists he has not engaged in proselytism — drew 30,000 people to a widely advertised prayer meeting in a Moscow sports arena.

Other American preachers such as Robert Schuller, Jimmy Swaggart and Pat Robertson have appeared on Russian television. The Hare Krishna movement has members across the former Soviet Union.

The Mormon Church began sending missionaries last year. The Rev. Sun Myung Moon's Unification Church has conducted regular seminars and lectures. Dozens of smaller foreign churches and sects are also active in Russia.

But all are dwarfed by Russian Orthodoxy, which claims more than 60 million believers and once wielded enormous political power as the nation's official religion until the Bolshevik revolution in 1917.

Evangelical Patriarch Bartholomeo, the visiting Eastern Orthodox Church leader who met Monday with Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, praised the legislation, the ITAR-Tass news agency said.

Seamstress weaves way into pioneer life

Provo woman makes 19th century clothing

By SANDRA DEMCHUK
Standard-Examiner staff

OGDEN — As a seamstress and clothing designer for historical Mormon pioneer sites like Cove Fort in central Utah and the Whitney K. Newall Store in Kirtland, Ohio, Carma deJong Anderson's work involves a lot of serendipity.

She'll spend weeks hunting for fabric of the right weave, color and print to match clothing the pioneers wore, she said.

"When I have a special need for a type of ribbon or material or anything, I start searching and all of a sudden it is right in front of me," said deJong Anderson, 63, of Ogden.

But if the cloth, for instance, isn't to be found, she'll spend weeks more finding a weaver who can make it because if a sewn object is going to handled by visitors, authenticity is important, she said.

"I have to train seamstresses to do this kind of work — stitches in the 19th century were twice as small as anything done in this century."

But sewing is the last stage of a long process involving the researching of patterns, styles, and the pioneer life.

"My work is a little like archeology — I go around the country to find fabrics or artifacts of the period or those made to look exactly like the period," she said.

'I have to train seamstresses to do this kind of work — stitches in the 19th century were twice as small as anything done in this century.' — Carma deJong Anderson

For the last 20 years deJong Anderson has constantly researched historic clothing and her best resources, she said, are a good library and old-time photographs.

Not surprisingly, deJong Anderson has a discerning eye. She's able to tell, for instance, when a designer has mixed up their historical periods. "Many people mix up the laces and buttons," she said.

With the patterns made, deJong Anderson spreads the bolts of fabric and cloths across the kitchen floor in her Provo home and starts cutting.

"I feel like I'm touching real lives when I go into the designs and fabrics of a certain culture and time," she said.

stunning examples of craftsmanship, Jackson said.

For example, a New York City painting firm, applied a colored plaster, mixed to resemble marble, to some of the main lobby's columns.

"They were some of the finest examples of that work in the state so they were patched and repaired," Jackson said. Other columns in the lobby had suffered some "unkind repairs," which rendered them unrestorable, he said.

Jackson admits dollar for dollar, it would have been less expensive to demolish the original structure and build a new one.

"But you couldn't build that beautiful of a building today," he said and in that respect, building a new structure wouldn't have been worth it.

"I think the church has given a tremendous gift to the city and also bought some good will among the preservation community," Jackson said.

Research

els frequently to the site to look at the work as it progresses and consults with the architecture firm, Cooper/Roberts, which is handling the project.

"The architect's objective is to preserve the original fabric of the building and hide modern heating systems or other additions. Everything that is not in keeping with the original site, we try to hide away or exclude," Enders said.

Historical properties should not, for instance, have asphalt walkways, signs or lighting fixtures unless they were part of the original structure.

Enders said when Cove Fort is completed sometime next year, equal amounts of time will have been spent researching the project as spent restoring it.

"Four years of work and four years of research. That's about true of any site," he said.

'Whatever projects are approved by the church, we do it well, we do it right and we do it with sensitivity.' — Don Enders, curator

For that research, Enders said he has gone into archives, private collections or wherever the source data was available.

"Whatever projects are approved by the church, we do it well, we do it right and we do it with sensitivity," Enders said.

The interior of the St. George Tabernacle was stripped down and cleared of its pews last year while crews restored the building in a 16-month effort funded by the LDS Church.

AUGUST MILLER/Standard-Examiner

The lobby of the Joseph Smith Memorial Building in Salt Lake City has been restored as closely as possible to how it looked when it first opened in 1911 as the Hotel Utah.

Restore

[illegible] of the tabernacle's interi[illegible] weren't much help. So the pai[illegible] was stripped down to its origin[illegible] colors to determine its "tru[illegible] shade," said Rod Park, superintendent of the St. George Tabernacle project.

Photographs did help the architecture team design three, 450-pound chandeliers after the building's kerosene originals. Unlike the originals, made of forged metal these chandeliers were cast in aluminum by a Salt Lake firm to cut down on their weight. Yet the load as far as Patten can tell, is the same.

"The intent was, even though it wasn't the original material, that it attain the original look," Patten said.

Restoration architects often find themselves asking to what extent they're committed to originality. Sometimes it is impractical to remain truly authentic, Patten said.

For instance, when construction crews found the plaster in the St. George Tabernacle's walls had been reinforced with human hair, Patten said the team opted to use a modern material, fiberglass, to give it that same strength.

The construction crews working on the tabernacle learned about the way construction crews worked 125 years ago, Patten said. "It was obvious they were craftsmen. They didn't have the power tools and mechanics we have now, but the skill in which they put things together was amazing to me," he said.

Restoration architects and the LDS Church actively search out artists who can replicate these crafts skills, Patten said.

Enders said Utah is lucky to have craftspeople trained in furniture restoration, traditional weaving methods, decorative painting, blacksmithing and hand-stitching.

"There are not very many who have had the experience with historical site restoration but we've never really had a problem finding the workers," Enders said.

The St. George project cost nearly $1 million to complete, the LDS Church said. Nearly $42 million was spent on remodeling the former Hotel Utah, a building Gordon B. Hinckley, first counselor in the First Presidency, said was saved as a "community treasure."

But historians and others would like to see the LDS Church and Utah cities create a preservation policy ensuring greater lengths are taken to keep historical buildings from being torn down.

"It is not that the demolition of buildings isn't going on — it is. It is still a hit and miss matter. By not having a policy, it is left to the decision of local people whether or not a building is to be torn down," Roberts said.

Longtime Ogden residents will recall that the decision to raze the 116-year-old Ogden Tabernacle in 1971 was made by local LDS stake presidents.

In a move approved by the First Presidency of the LDS Church and the church's building committee, the tabernacle was demolished because it was said to be in "visual conflict with the beautiful new temple now nearing completion," the Ogden Standard-Examiner reported on Aug. 30, 1971.

The land on which the tabernacle stood was fenced in and landscaped as part of the surroundings for the Ogden LDS Temple.

Randolph citizens restore Woodruff's 1872 log home

Everyone from youth to senior citizens worked on project

RANDOLPH (AP) — The 1872 log home of former Mormon Church President Wilford Woodruff was a rotting, rundown eyesore before the town decided to preserve it.

Three and one-half years and some 800 hours of labor later, the town held a dedication service for the building to celebrate its restoration and conversion to the new Randolph tourist information center.

"This is a purely local project," said Douglas J. Bingham, Randolph mayor. Bingham said most of the work on the home has been done by volunteers, with only one paid employee, a carpenter who took an interest in the building.

The town also hired an architect to make plans for the project and took some advice from a building historian.

Bingham said everyone from church groups to senior citizens has been working on the project.

"We had some 75-year-old Relief Society sisters out there whitewashing," he said.

The foundation of the home is original, and only a few of the original logs had to be replaced, Bingham said. The renovators collected flooring and stones for the front steps from other historic sites and also used old glass for the windows.

When the renovators cleaned up under the old floor boards of the building, they found many interesting artifacts, including medicine bottles, percussion caps, spoons, and glass, Bingham said.

The building was originally divided in half like a duplex, with one of Woodruff's wives, Sarah Brown Woodruff, living in one side and Woodruff's eldest son and his family living in the other side. The building was undivided when the next owners, another polygamist family, moved in and has been left undivided in the restoration.

Woodruff's family lived in Randolph from 1871 to 1876, and the home in Randolph remained in the family's possession until 1898. Woodruff was an apostle for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints at the time and spent much of his time away from Randolph, although he loved to visit and enjoyed the hunting and fishing here, Bingham said.

State forced to settle 2-county landfill feud

Utah's Solid and Hazardous Waste Control Board has agreed to do what Box Elder County commissioners staunchly refused: Call a public hearing on the proposal to establish a controversial garbage landfill near White Valley in western Box Elder County.

The hearing also will consider a petition signed by 13 of the 14 mayors of Box Elder's incorporated municipalities asking that the state agency put on hold Davis Energy Recovery's District's plans to build and operate the landfill northwest of Tremonton.

This action is the latest in a twist of intriguing events that have for more than a year plagued a proposal of Ogden engineer Lew Wangsgard to establish the landfill that he and his business colleagues envisioned would provide adequate landfill facility for cities and counties along the northern rim of the Wasatch Front into the next century.

Wangsgard and his associates have been beset with opposition since the option on the site was signed. His latest move — the Davis interest in the White Valley site materializing — would free him of any obligation for problems encountered at the location if it becomes operational and ensures him a substantial return on his investment.

The White Valley proposed landfill has been rocked with controversy for more than a year and was in hiatus after Box Elder commissioners faced enormous opposition from western Box Elder ranchers and farmers, the Safe Water Drinking Association and the threat it poses to contaminating drinking water as well as the potential for flooding and damages inherent should there be earthquakes.

Two weeks ago the land was purchased by the Davis County Energy Recovery District.

Box Elder mayors, seeing the county's three commissioners as surrendering their obligation to question the latest development, petitioned the state Department of Environmental Quality to place the permit transfer on hold. The mayors correctly argue why should another county be allowed to put a landfill on a site that has been rejected by Box Elder County?

Earlier, counties along the Wasatch Front that are faced with the burden of finding new landfill sites declined to join the cooperative that was initially proposed to operate the White Valley site.

Members of the Davis County Energy Recovery District have never shunned controversy, having fought strong opposition to the initial plans for establishing the burn plant. They have no intention of backing away from their plan to own a 1,120 garbage disposal site in Box Elder County, a considerable distance from where the trash would originate.

But they do have one hurdle. The state's Solid and Hazardous Waste Division has final agreed to a public forum — something that an issue of this immense interest demands. It has appropriately stepped into the dispute with a pledge of a public hearing.

Opposing forces should be expected to deal unemotionally with the dialogue, make an honest attempt at resolving a sticky, political and potentially litigious situation, one that has been punctuated with so much rancor and so many accusations that a reasoned solution was not impossible — until now with the state solving what should have been a local problem.

POINT/COUNTERPOINT

54-year-old Hatch Act must be updated and clarified for today

■ John Glenn
For Scripps Howard News Service

Whenever debate over reforming the Hatch Act comes up, as it has in the Senate this past week, it always brings out ridiculous extremes of opinion.

The Hatch Act restricts the political activity of federal employees. I am trying to bring it up to date, but opponents claim I am trying to destroy it.

Nothing could be further from the truth. My bill strengthens the Hatch Act. Simply put, the reform legislation would do three things:

1. On-the-job, it would make the Hatch Act tougher than it is now, retaining and strengthening current prohibitions against on-the-job political activity by government employees and beefing up penalties for violators. In fact, my bill clearly says no political activity of any kind on-the-job.

2. Off-the-job, but still with major restrictions, it would allow America's 3 million civil servants to reclaim their constitutional rights by participating in our nation's political process voluntarily and on their own time as private citizens.

3. Finally, it would clarify current rules that are confusing, nonsensical and contradictory.

I want to make clear that the Senate version of Hatch Act reform differs greatly on some very key points from the House-passed version. They are separate bills. The House version would allow federal employees to solicit contributions from the general public and run for partisan local elections. The Senate legislation would continue to ban these activities.

But why should we change the Hatch Act at all?

The Hatch Act was passed in 1939 — before we had a professional civil service and when federal jobs were awarded not on the basis of merit competition but as patronage plums for political contributions. The Hatch Act was necessary then to protect civil servants from this climate based on patronage.

However, 54 years later, the situation has vastly changed. The civil service has become well established, professional and classified. We have numerous laws to protect federal employees from coercion. And if this did occur, federal employees could appeal to the Merit Systems Protection Board.

My bill does not ignore the realities of the past and present.

What the legislation does is bring some clarification and fairness to what has been a confusing and maladministered Hatch Act. Through the years, 1,500 identified rulings, regulations and interpretations have grown up around the Hatch Act, many conflicting and unclear. Some of those have been corrected, some have not.

Let me give you a couple of examples of what I mean:

— Federal employees can plaster their cars, or fill up their yards with a candidate's campaign sign. But if federal employees go to a political rally and wave that same sign, that's a Hatch Act violation.

— A federal employee can contribute up to $1,000 to a federal candidate. But the Hatch Act prohibits a federal employee, who may not have an extra $1,000 or so lying around the house, from giving a candidate any sort of in-kind contribution, such as stuffing envelopes or circulating a petition.

— A federal employee can wear a candidate's campaign button (any size) on-the-job, but is prohibited from campaigning "for or against" that candidate.

And remember that it may well be the boss who wears that campaign buton around the office. That not-so-subtle coercion of subordinates is permitted under current law.

My bill ends this game of trivial confusion.

In short, this legislation makes a long-needed clear distinction between political activity on-the-job — and political activity off-the-job, away from work and on an employee's own time.

The former would be absolutely and unequivocally prohibited — and that includes the wearing of campaign buttons on-the-job, which current law permits. I make the Hatch Act more restrictive and tougher than it is now, on-the-job.

But voluntary political activity off-the-job and after hours, still with sensible controls and restrictions, would be recognized for just what it is: a basic constitutional right and a crucial ingredient of a free, democratic society.

Hatch Act 'deform' bill would pave way for new spoils system

■ Mitch McConnell
For Scripps Howard News Service

Beware of politicians bearing gifts labeled "reform," for the attractive wrapping can be deceiving.

The latest "reform" charade — this time concerning the 1939 Hatch Act — is another political scheme that is "reform" in name only. In fact, it actually guts a reform that has protected this country from political corruption and coercion for more than half a century.

The Hatch Act "deform" bill would turn the federal government into an arm of the political parties, reviving the spoils system and further eroding public confidence in government.

As with other "reform" efforts, this latest bill is a solution in search of a problem. Federal employees are not clamoring for this bill. Employees covered under the current Hatch Act law can vote, contribute money to candidates and volunteer in their off hours for non-partisan political activities.

Federal workers' political rights, as well as prohibited activities, are delineated in current law. By federal standards, the rules are clear and concise.

Nevertheless, proponents of the bill contend they are confusing and need to be clarified. The fact is, this matter that can be dealt with administratively.

The Hatch Act "deform" bill would unleash 3 million federal employees to become activists in the electoral process. Soliciting campaign contributions. Running for office. Managing campaigns. Manning telephone banks.

We have heard a lot of talk about "streamlining" government. The only action so far is in the opposite direction. How in the world are we going to cut the federal government after we have turned it into a massive political machine?

Promoted under the guise of civil rights and free speech, the Hatch Act "deform" bill would leave federal employees vulnerable to coercion by supervisors and union bosses engaging in partisan politics and soliciting contributions for political action committees.

After five decades of protection under the Hatch Act, federal employees would now be pressured to exercise these now-found "rights."

Ironically, the Hatch Act of 1939 was hailed by President Franklin Roosevelt, the architect of the New Deal programs from which much of the bureaucracy stems. By prohibiting certain partisan political activities among federal employees, the act served to ensure the integrity of the civil service.

The Hatch Act "deform" bill would pave the way for a new spoils system on an unprecedented scale.

Some argue that the days of the old-style spoils system have passed, and that the vigilance of the press and federal employee unions can replace the Hatch Act's protections. That is a leap of faith this country cannot afford.

The federal government is more pervasive than ever in our society, affecting virtually every aspect of our lives. Many are understandably alarmed at the prospect of Internal Revenue Service agents having a political agenda on the side. There are many more frightening scenarios. Consider the implications of a politically active Central Intelligence Agency.

And remember "Travelgate." When the heat was turned up in the White House because of its travel office flasco, the president's staff pressured the FBI for help and even discussed using the Internal Revenue Service.

Partisan politicos are understandably excited at the prospect of inducting the federal workforce into their political army. The American people, however, would not be benefited by a politically active bureaucracy. Nor would the majority of federal employees who simply want to do their job and not be drafted into political combat.

If this Hatch Act "deform" is approved, federal criminal laws would not be sufficient to fight patronage crime. The very nature of patronage crime makes it difficult to prove "beyond a reasonable doubt." Subordinate employees, who usually are the victims of patronage schemes, are motivated to please and protect their superiors. Few are willing to come forward as witnesses.

Serving in the United States government is an honor and a privilege. It also entails some sacrifice. All of us — elected, appointed, and civil service employees — are supposed to be "public servants."

In the case of federal employees, service entails forfeiting some political rights. In exchange, they receive protection from political pressure and jobs for which they should feel very fortunate.

Israel, PLO sign historic peace accord

Arafat, Rabin shake hands in U.S. capital

WASHINGTON (AP) — Enemies without mercy for a generation, Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization signed an accord today promising self-government for Palestinians. The White House ceremony marked a momentous step toward peace in the Middle East.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat stood with President Clinton in brilliant sunshine as aides signed the agreement. Arafat extended his hand to Rabin, and after a moment's hesitation, Rabin shook it.

An invited audience of 3,000 — former Presidents Jimmy Carter and George Bush included — watched on the South Lawn as the deal was sealed. Half a world away, Palestinians flocked to the streets of the Biblical city of Jericho in anticipation of the pen strokes that would deliver self-rule.

"Enough of blood and tears. Enough," Rabin said to the Palestinians. "Ladies and gentlemen, the time for peace has come."

Yet, in a somber tone, he noted that the ceremony came too late for the families of the victims of Palestinian "violence, terror whose pain will never heal."

Following Rabin to the podium, Arafat said: "My people are hoping that this agreement marks the beginning of the end of a chapter of pain and suffering which has lasted throughout the century."

He expressed the hope that the agreement would "usher in an age of peace coexistence and equal rights," and appealed to the United States to help implement it.

Clinton opened the ceremony. "Welcome to this great occasion of history and hope, he said. "The peace of the brave is within our reach."

The ceremony came off without a hitch, although an administration source said last-minute negotiations this morning resulted in changing one word in the agreement. At a Blue Room reception just before the signing ceremony, the word "Palestinian" was changed to "PLO" in the preamble of the agreement, at the request of the PLO, said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

There was no public mention of last-minute maneuvering as Clinton escorted Rabin and Arafat from the White House to the podium where the signing took place. The Israeli leader was unsmiling; Arafat, in his military tunic and kaffiyeh, beamed and waved to the crowd.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Arafat's aide, Mahmoud Abbas, signed the agreements, the Israeli first and the Palestinian official second.

"We are sincere. We mean business. We do not seek to shape your life or determine your destiny," Peres said.

Said Abbas: "Peaceful cooperation and coexistence are the only means for reaching understanding and for realizing the hopes of the Palestinians and the Israelis."

Both looked ahead with hope toward peace between Israel and all its Arab neighbors.

When the ceremony ended — 30 minutes late — Clinton led Arafat and Rabin over to many of the dignitaries for a last, lingering round of handshakes and smiles.

Arafat departed the White House immediately afterward. Clinton met privately with Rabin and Peres in a gesture that reflected Israel's long-standing alliance with the United States.

The Associated Press

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin (left) hesitated before accepting the offered hand of PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat at the signing today of the peace agreement. President Bill Clinton (center) appears pleased by the handshake gesture, however.

Outside the gates of the White House, police arrested more than 20 Jewish activists demonstrating against the accords. Police say the protesters were arrested for failure to move their protest.

The Israeli-PLO accord provides for mutual recognition, PLO control over the Gaza and the West Bank, regions that Israeli forces seized during a six-day war in 1967.

Clinton was gracious toward his predecessors, acknowledging Carter's role in forging the Israeli-Egypt peace agreement in 1979, and Bush's efforts to inaugurate an international peace conference in Madrid in 1991.

He quoted the Prophet Isaiah: "The cry violence shall no longer be heard in your land," and ended with words of peace in three languages: Shalom, Salaam, Peace."

Looking to the future, he said, "I pledge the active support of the United States of America to the difficult work that lies ahead."

Clinton was the hopeful host for this latest installment in history, pledging the United States would assist in implementing the agreements, and expressing optimism that Jordan, Lebanon and Syria also would negotiate successfully with Israel.

Palestinians in Jericho rejoice signing

JERICHO, Occupied West Bank (AP) — With their once-banned flag flying overhead, hundreds of Palestinians danced arm-in-arm today celebrating the prospect of shedding a quarter-century of Israeli military rule.

"Today we are celebrating our state from Jericho to Gaza," said Jamal Safi, a local leader. "Today we are holding our heads up proudly."

Instead of soldiers, the streets were patrolled by about 200 activists from Fida, a moderate pro-PLO party, who were wearing brand new khaki uniforms with small Palestinian flags under their epaulets.

Jericho, a biblical city by the banks of the Jordan river, is the focal point of Palestinian festivities for the accord. The city of 15,000 is expected to be Arafat's headquarters after Israeli troops pull back.

About three dozen men were dancing the "debka," a traditional Palestinian circle dance. Others were waving palm leaves. The beating of drums filled the air.

Pictures of Yasser Arafat and the red, white, green and black Palestinian flags decorated the town's main square where Palestinians marched and shouted pro-Arafat slogans. A billboard-sized portrait of Arafat was painted on the town hall.

A week ago, Israeli soldiers would likely have chased celebrants across the square and ordered them to take down the flags. But the rules of the game have changed overnight.

"I just love to see all those flags going up," said Nancy Qunbar, an 18-year-old student. "I only hope we will have a nation one day. We want to live in peace like everyone else."

"People of the West Bank cannot be broken," the demonstrators shouted, raising portraits of Arafat.

Fire at apartment forces evacuation

No serious injuries have been reported

SOUTH OGDEN — A short-lived but fierce fire officials believe began in a bed mattress forced the evacuation of dozens of residents at 10:20 a.m. today before destroying 18 units of The Meadows apartment and condominium complex building No. 2, 5666 S. Meadow Lane.

Firefighters late this morning still were extinguishing smoldering hot spots and arrangements were being made with the American Red Cross to find alternative housing for residents of the 36-unit building.

Although investigators still had several areas to search, Fire Chief Rod Matteucci said he believed no one was injured.

He said he believes the fire began in a mattress in Apt. 140 on the building's ground level.

Information was unconfirmed on who lives in the apartment.

However, Larry Farr, the building's manager, said he was told the fire was reported by children who were watching television in the apartment.

Neighbors watched as firefighters doused flames shooting from the upper and lower stories.

Farr, also a part owner of the building, said he was in an apartment in one of the complex's other buildings when the fire broke out. "But by the time I ran over here, the fire had spread. It was going straight up the side of the building," he said.

Spectators watch Building No. 2 of The Meadows apartment and condominium complex in South Ogden burn this morning. No serious injuries were reported.

Miriam Molitor, who lives in the apartment directly above the unit where it is believed the flames started, said she noticed there was smoke coming in her apartment a little after 10 a.m.

"Someone pounded on the door to get me out. I tried to get my cat and they wouldn't let me stay to get him. I've had that cat for 14 years," she said tearfully.

South Ogden firefighters called for assistance from Roy, Washington Terrace and the Weber Fire District.

The state fire marshal will handle the investigation into the fire's exact cause, Matteucci said.

Parliament convenes to approve end of white rule in S. Africa

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) — Parliament convened today to pass legislation that would end white rule, and black leader Nelson Mandela said he would call for the lifting of international sanctions once the laws are approved.

Legislators faced opposition from white conservatives who have threatened civil war if the bills passed. But supporters of President F.W. de Klerk said the multiracial elections in April would not be delayed.

"I believe that postponing the election would lead to more violence, and for that reason, we could not even consider it," Constitutional Affairs Minister Roelf Meyer told reporters.

At issue in this 11-day special session are four bills, approved in black-white negotiations, that would put the country on an irreversible path toward multiracial democracy.

The most controversial would establish a Transitional Executive Council, a multiracial panel representing the different political groups that would help govern the country until elections next year.

The council would severely undercut the president's powers and have the power to veto presidential decisions.

That would meet the African National Congress' final condition for endorsing the lifting of all sanctions against South Africa.

"As soon as that bill has been passed by Parliament, we will take that step," Mandela, the ANC president, told a rally outside Cape Town. "That is the significance of this Parliament."

The other bills would set up a commission to oversee the country's first multiracial elections and formally end government control of the media.

Debate on the legislation was not expected until next week, and Parliament must meet again in November to approve a new constitution.

The laws are virtually assured passage in the all-white Parliament, which is dominated by de Klerk's National Party. However, the right-wing Conservative Party leader, Ferdi Hartzenberg, said he was "ready for the fight" to try to block the bills.

The Conservatives have 39 seats in Parliament to the National Party's 93 and have virtually no chance of forming an alliance with other white parties to block the legislation. But militant whites who support apartheid could cause violent disruptions that would threaten the transition to black majority rule.

Passage of the bills also could spark backlashes by black opponents. The biggest of these groups is the Inkatha Freedom Party.

More than 10,000 blacks have died in clashes blamed on the ANC-Inkatha feud, and violence often follows major breakthroughs in negotiations. Small militant black groups who see negotiations as a ploy by whites to cling to power also oppose the legislation.

Even as it debates the bills, the government will be meeting with the Conservatives and Inkatha in an attempt to bring them back to negotiations.

But the approval of the bills by black and white negotiators, led by the government and ANC, have sent a clear signal to boycotting groups that elections, not unanimity among rivals, are top priority.

Lifting of international sanctions would enable South Africa to apply for desperately needed loans from the World Bank and would give foreign investors the go-ahead to do business in South Africa.

The lifting of sanctions is essential if South Africa's economy is to recover from years of recession and unemployment of nearly 50 percent.

No flags fly, no anthems play in a carefully scripted ceremony

WASHINGTON (AP) — The ceremony was choreographed down to the last footstep. The White House was taking no chances of a protocol land mine shattering the fragile peace dawning between Israel and the PLO.

No flags fluttered and no anthems were heard today when Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat walked onto the South Lawn. That was to avoid offending anyone: The Palestinians, who don't have an independent state, or the Israelis, who do.

Throughout the world millions watched on television a series of pictures few ever expected to see. Rabin and Arafat emerging from the White House together, on either side of President Clinton. The two shaking each other's hands, not once but twice. Arafat politely applauding Rabin's remarks.

The first meeting between the one-time bitter enemies occurred away from the 3,000 invited guests and the eyes of the world.

The two joined other dignitaries, including former Presidents Bush and Carter, in the Blue Room for a pre-ceremony gathering hosted by Clinton.

Excitement was running high hours before the ceremony to sign the historic accord, which promises Palestinian self-government. TV anchors reported live from the South Lawn, and a long line of reporters and visitors snaked outside the White House gates as early as 6:30 a.m.

A group of black robed ultra-Orthodox Jews opposed to the Israel-PLO accord lent a festive atmosphere to the chaos, standing across from the White House and singing Hasidic songs about the advent of the Messiah.

The ceremony, lasting slightly more than an hour, began at 11:15 a.m., with Vice President Al Gore leading a small procession onto a 16-foot by 24-foot stage surrounded on three sides by plastic folding chairs to seat the guests.

Gore was accompanied onto the dais by Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PLO political director Mahmoud Abbas — also known as Abu Mazen. They were followed by Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev.

Bringing up the rear: Clinton, flanked on the right by Rabin and on the left by Arafat, who was in military garb topped by his customary kaffiyeh.

Brief remarks followed by Clinton, Peres and Abu Mazen, who spoke in Arabic and had an English translator. Peres and Abu Mazen each then signed two copies of the agreement, which grants self-government to the 1.8 million Palestinians in the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Finally, as Arafat and Rabin looked on, Christopher and Kozyrev affixed their signatures as witnesses, their golden pens flickering in the mid-day sun.

Study

tant attributes," he said.

Some of the most interesting results were what researchers didn't find: no inevitable "midlife crisis," no indications that divorce alone created problem children.

Competence was not a guarantee of success, and some subjects were late bloomers, Clausen said. For men, competence could predict financial and occupational success. For women, it was more likely to predict marital success, with dependability being the most important component.

The rapidly changing roles of women affected many subjects, such as participant Alice Neal, who described herself as "boy crazy" in high school and married young. In 1961 she took a part-time job in a chain store and eventually became general manager of a children's store.

The times trapped some participants, like the black man who had one of the highest IQs of the group, over 150, but became a police officer because "he had no hope" of achieving academic prominence.

The research began as three studies at the UC Berkeley institute, now the Institute of Human Development. Two followed infants born in 1928 and 1929; the third, started in 1931, followed a slightly older group of pre-adolescents.

Most of the subjects were whites from middle- and working-class families.

Over time, the studies "just took on a life of their own," said Clausen, who credited the close relationships that pioneering researchers such as Jean Macfarlane established with subjects.

In all, nearly 300 people were tracked for more than a half-century. The last big follow-up was in 1982, capped off with questionnaires in 1990 and 1991. Some have died, but almost 200 participants responded to the last questionnaires.

Unquestionably, receiving so much scrutiny affected participants' lives, Clausen said. Several consulted with researchers before making big decisions.

But there seemed to be a stronger influence at work than the kindness of those strangers.

"Today we have all sorts of counselors in the schools that we didn't have back in the '30s, and yet the kids are not benefiting nearly as much as one might anticipate," Clausen said.

"I can't help but feel that the home, the family is the critical place that we have to work," he said. "We have to get parents much better informed on how important they are."

My Righteous Influence

Oh Lord bless me Thy daughter
Let my strength be as Thy own
May righteousness fill my being
And by my countenance make it known.

Remembering the power of my actions
So never wavering; forever true
I would stay in tune with Thy Spirit
Doing all Thou would have me do.

That the influence I have on others
Always be pleasing to Thee.
Help me set a worthy example
While here in mortality.

Might I forever stand as a beacon
Casting a light leading to Thee.
Knowing this calling is sacred
Thy handmaiden I would be.

Right thing was done in Sky View hazing

Controversy over cancelled football games at Skyview High School seems to be most controversial among parents, players and students at that school. Working as an elementary school secretary in Davis County and also a football Mom of two High School football players, I have had the occasion over the past few days to talk with parents, teachers, students and administrators about these events.

The consensus is the superintendent did what had to be done when the proper procedures weren't followed at the time of the infraction. Upholding the basic individual rights of each student is the responsibility of school personnel. If a coach or principal cannot enforce these rights and follow basic policy, then the superintendent has no recourse than to make a no-nonsense statement such as he did.

With tens of thousands of dollars poured into athletic programs in districts throughout Utah, administrators had better reiterate: playing school sports is a privilege, not a right. The coach at Skyview can think of no reason he would bar a player from the team, and I can think of a multitude of reasons a player should be cut.

Poor grades, disciplinary infractions, drug and alcohol use at any time, chronic unexcused absences, unsportsmanlike behavior, and in this case, the harming of another student are reasons enough to warrant such action.

It is appalling that some parents at Skyview High School think that their sons' behavior was good clean fun, done every year and if someone gets hurt and takes the abuse seriously, he is the ostracized party. This attitude harms the system more than ever because the student knows Mom and Dad will be there to make an excuse for their "fun."

These moms and dads need to start a savings account designated for bail money as their kids are learning early not to take responsibility for their actions.

As a Mom who loves watching her sons play football, I would be devastated if they were denied the chance to playoffs. However, not in these circumstances. I would have to look at the big picture. That being the football organization at Skyview needs cleaning up in disciplinary procedures. The program can only improve with stricter guidelines. This is harsh punishment, but I don't believe it exceeds the crime.

I hope the young man, by stepping forward, knows the support he has from thousands of people in this community. I hope the superintendent knows that he has the backing of many people outside of his district and that the court upholding his decision was applauded.

And, I hope that those who innocently had to sacrifice the rest of their football season realize that the right thing ultimately was done.

How can anyone condone hazing act?

I feel great respect for Brian Seamons on making the decision to report the hazing incident his peers imposed upon him, also Judge Hadfield for his decision.

If Judge Ben Hadfield had reversed the decision, allowing the Sky View football team to finish the season, he would have been condoning the act. Fixing the blame on the innocent (Brian and Mrs. Seamons) indicates how mentally sick our society has become.

I feel head coach Doug Snow ought to be fired for condoning the annual hazing ritual imposed by his team, the names of the participating players and their parents ought to be published, then run the guilty out of town.

Our children are the future leaders of our country, do we want the Brian's who stand up for themselves and what's right to lead us, or do we continue to support the ones who want to cover-up, and fix the blame on others?

The offense (fun) didn't last near as long as the consequences will, the team could have been playing good defense.

Harrisville Utah Stake Conference Bulletin

November 20 - 21

We, as a stake presidency, humbly invite you, as families, to the last stake conference which we will conduct. It has been, at once, humbling beyond measure, and exhilarating, to serve as your stake presidency. To the best of our ability, and as we have been prompted and directed by the spirit, we have attempted to serve the people of the stake.

We have many things to be thankful for. But at this time we are espeecially thankful for your support and love over the years. It hae been an inspiration to us to see you serve in the many capacities which you have accepted and performed so well.

It is our desire to end our service with the same plea which we have emphasized so strongly over the years. Have your Family Home Evenings, call your families together and have family prayer, pay your tithing and do your home and visiting teaching. All the commandments are important, of course, but we have so many children coming up in the stake that the most pressing concern right now is to cultivate the teaching of the children, and the love of husband for wife, wife for husbands, and parents for their children.

It is our humble desire that you will support the new stake presidency as you have supported us. God will continue to bless us as a stake if we support those who are called to preside over us.

Sincerely,

Harrisville Utah Stake Presidency

REX D. PINEGAR

On September 30, 1989 he was called as a member of the Presidency of the Seventy and as the Executive Director of the Curriculum Department.

Born September 18, 1931, in Orem, Utah, he married Bonnie Lee Crabb of Spanish Fork, Utah, January 24, 1955, in the Salt Lake Temple. They are the parents of six children.

Family Gospel Study Ideas

1. See that each family member has his own set of scriptures, if possible. Children could earn their own money to buy scriptures or receive them for their baptisms or birthdays.
2. Read the scriptures chronologically from beginning to end.
3. Read the scriptures topically (by subject) using the tools in the Appendix of the LDS edition of the King James Bible or the Index of the triple combination.
4. Set a specific amount of time daily to study ten, fifteen, or thirty minutes. Or set a specific amount to read each day - a verse, a chapter, a page. Adjust the time commitment to the ages of the family members.
5. Read scriptures aloud.
6. Memorize selected passages.
7. Read a chapter, including each footnote and cross-reference given.
8. Tell scripture stories.
9. Have a find the scripture contest (sometimes called a scripture chase) in which family members are asked to find certain scriptures as quickly as they can using key words as clues.
10. Display pictures (obtained from the meetinghouse library or personal files) that illustrate the scriptures studied.
11. Play scripture guessing games such as "Guess Who I Am?", "Scripture Heroes." or commercial scripture games.
12. Vary scripture reading by watching films strips or videocassettes from the meetinghouse library, or role-play scriptures.
13. Read the scriptures referenced at the end of a hymn in the hymnbook; then sing the hymn together.
14. Discuss the scriptures as you read them.
15. Tape-record scripture stories or passages to be played by children at bedtime, on car trips, or when parents are away.
16. Make a family flag, selection a scripture to be used as a family motto, such as "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord" (Joshua 24: 15)
17. Have a scripture reading marathon in which family members read the scriptures, individually or as a family, for a set time or for as long as desired. Comfortable pillows and snacks could be provided for the designated block of time.
18. Read appropriate scriptures for special occasions, such as Christmas, Easter, blessings, baptisms, priesthood ordinations, missions, and marriages.
19. Make a family reading calendar and focus on one gospel topic each week.
20. Encourage children to mark their scriptures.
21. Keep a record of scripture reading, individually and as a family.
22. Ask each other questions as you read the scriptures.
23. Keep a notebook and write thoughts, questions, and ideas for talks that come to you as you read. It could become a record of your personal revelations about the word of God.

Time spent reading the scriptures as a family could be some of the most valuable time that parents spend in raising their families.

WEST POINT — Two people were killed early Sunday in a West Point home by a shotgun-wielding ex-husband who led police on a high-speed chase and then took his own life before authorities could capture him.

Marchant

Slain by multiple shotgun blasts were Misty Marchant, 32, of 1120 N. 3200 West in West Point and a close friend, Kirt Swann, 32, of 160 Childs Ave., in Ogden.

Police said the couple was killed about 4:20 a.m. by Kenneth Marchant, 29, of West Point, no address available, who was under a restraining order and already on probation after threatening his ex-wife at gunpoint earlier this spring.

The alleged assailant then drove his car to his father's home nearby at 3756 S. 1800 North in West Point, where a Clinton police officer spotted him running to the rear of the residence.

At least one shot was heard by the officer before Marchant was found dead in a bedroom in his father's home of what police described as a self-inflicted gunshot wound.

The Davis County Sheriff's dispatch center reported receiving two calls on the emergency 911 line at 4:20 a.m. and a dispatcher heard screams and at least one shotgun blast over the phone. Several neighbors also verified hearing gunshots.

During the first call a woman's voice is heard screaming, "Don't kill him. No, Kenny, don't" before shots are fired.

About seven seconds later the woman said, "Help me, my husband" and "Oh, Kenny," followed by several more gun shots.

A small child also can be heard crying, "Mommy, I want mommy ... where's my mommy."

When deputies arrived, they found the two shooting victims upstairs but the suspect had already fled. The child was unharmed.

According to police reports and accounts by neighbors, Marchant had attempted to break into the house through a door on the lower level with a sledge hammer and

OGDEN — When Denise Whitesides thinks of her brother, she will always remember him as a gentle, good-natured man with a ready laugh who loved to play recreation league softball.

Swann

And as someone who was always there to protect.

Kirt Swann died early Sunday in a fusillade of shotgun fire in a West Point home where he had moved recently to help protect 32-year-old Misty Marchant from a jealous ex-husband who allegedly had threatened her life with a gun last April.

Marchant also died when her estranged husband broke into her home, killing her with two shotgun blasts. Kenneth Marchant died a short time later at his own hand.

"That's the way Kirt was," said the Riverdale woman. "He was very protective ... he would always take care of me.

"In know he felt he was protecting Misty," Whitesides said. "That's the way he looked at it."

Swann, a service writer at a local automobile dealership and the father of four daughters by a previous marriage, had been shot once in the back with a shotgun and was reportedly fighting his way upstairs either to help Misty Marchant or get her 5-year-old daughter out of harm's way when he was killed.

Police reports indicate Marchant, who had gone upstairs into a bedroom to then fired a shotgun blast through the door hitting Swann in the back.

Then Marchant ran upstairs to a bedroom where he shot his ex-wife, who had filed for divorce last April in an effort to end what Hope Anderson — one of Misty Marchant's closest friends — described as a long pattern of spouse abuse.

Despite his wounds, Swann struggled upstairs to either help Misty or rescue her 5-year-old daughter, who had been sleeping upstairs. Marchant then shot Swann several more times while the child watched.

When Marchant decided to divorce her husband, Anderson said the estranged husband showed up at West Point home with a gun. Anderson said she witnessed Marchant chasing Misty around the yard and threatening her with the firearm.

"She was screaming and all the time she was talking to 911," said Anderson, who said her friend finally fled across the street to take shelter in the Anderson home while police arrested the man.

"His sister posted $500 bail and within two hours, he was back standing over her bed staring at her," said Anderson. "Misty said he ripped the phones out of the wall, beat her up, tried to have sex with her and then left."

"She was just beside herself that they (authorities) didn't call her or anything" to warn her that Marchant had been released within a couple of hours, Anderson recalled. "Misty was so shaken . . . and she was furious."

Anderson said Misty had been assured that her ex-husband would be charged with assault with a deadly weapon, a felony, but the charge was later reduced to a misdemeanor.

Marchant was placed on three years probation, fined $250 and told he should undergo alcoholism counseling, Anderson said, but did not do any jail time.

"She told me that she couldn't believe he didn't get any jail time and said that all her life was worth was $250," Anderson said.

Despite his probation and a restraining order, Anderson said Marchant constantly harassed his ex-wife by showing up at the house or waiting nearby when she came home from work at the Internal Revenue Service. "He was almost stalking her."

"I just can't understand it," she said. "I just feel the system failed Misty. She called the cops. She called 911, but it just didn't work."

Anderson said she does not fault police, who always responded quickly to Misty's calls for help.

"The police were wonderful in this case," she said. "They were doing their jobs to the best of their ability — but it's the system.

"I, for one, would be willing to pay more taxes to build another jail to have more facilities available so people like that are not turned out on the street and let go," said Anderson.

Anderson said Swann, who had known Misty since high school, had moved into the West Point home with an offer to help pay rent and help protect his longtime friend.

She also said Marchant had refused to believe Misty's assurances that she and Swann were not having an affair and kept the pressure on his ex-wife, using visitations with the couple's 5-year-old daughter "to torment and manipulate Misty."

In the ensuing weeks, said Anderson, the relationship between Marchant and Swann blossomed.

"That's the first time I had seen Misty that happy," said Anderson, who said she and Misty became close friends because she, too, had once been involved in an abusive relationship and the similar experiences drew them together.

"I'm just thankful that for the last 60 days, she had a little happiness in her life . . . because Kirt made her happy."

Despite all of the abuse and fear, Anderson said, Misty always felt badly she could not work things out and had felt compelled to seek a divorce from her husband.

But the fear never really left, and the ex-husband's repeated and illegal presence in the Marchant's West Point neighborhood was unnerving to the neighbors and friends alike. Some neighbors who had helped watch the Marchants' daughter even became fearful about giving any assistance.

"It terrorizes your entire neighborhood," said Anderson.

Just two days before the slaying Anderson said Misty had told her "I'm just so afraid that Kenny will kill me."

One of the most tragic things, she said, was that Marchant's daughter — who had become very attached to Swann — had watched her own father brutally murder another man.

"She will be scarred for life," said Anderson, who was near tears. "When I went over there this morning, she told me, 'Guess what. I just saw my dad shoot Kirt.' "

The Clock and The Bell

Life changed for the better with the addition of the new bell and clock as part of the Tabernacle tower. Up til then the pioneers had set their few timepieces by the sun as it came up each morning, and signaled townspeople with an old bass drum. As the tower went up they retired the drum and gladly gave up the sun as the way to tell time. Gone were meetings and school classes late in starting and slow to close. Gone were water turns that overlapped and other inconveniences brought about by everyone's personal interpretation of sun time. Being on time was not only important but now possible with the handsome clock superbly built in London and the clear-ringing bell from Troy, New York, both brought to St. George through much personal sacrifice. One townsperson recalled:

"It was grand to have a clock. We loved it because it gave us prestige. It raised the morale of the people. We went to church on time, came home on time, opened and closed parties on time. The old town had moved forward..they had a clock and a bell. From now on people were born by the clock, they died by the clock."

So proud were they of the new town bell, they first put it to work in a temporary position on the main floor to signal lunchtime for the workers. Once in the tower it triumphantly announced Brigham Young's arrival, sounded the passing of local pioneers, made known the deaths of presidents of the Church and Nation, and on January 6, 1896 it tolled for two hours and forty minutes to proclaim that Utah had become a state.

A Building of Purpose

Since the time of dedication in 1876, the Tabernacle served the people of St. George in grand style. Whether a Sunday worship service, a political town gathering or the funeral of a member of the Mormon faith or a non-member, the Tabernacle provided a respected meeting place for the townspeople. Choirs and singing groups were welcome and patriotic programs encouraged. So grateful were the early pioneers for this enclosed place of beauty, it became the focal point of their life and activities. Often, people who were not Mormons benefitted as well, as told in the story of Father Scanlon.

The Father Scanlon Story

In the 1880's Silver Reef, about 25 miles north of St. George became a booming mining town with the discovery of a silver vein. Miners appeared in this frontier town which was first named Bonanza City and merchants started many frontier businesses. Some St. George settlers even found a market for their farm goods. One person, in particular, remembered from this time was Father Lawrence Scanlon, who with a few other Catholic fathers, was sent to Silver Reef to attend to the religious needs of the miners and some townsfolk. He was an outgoing, friendly person who right away formed friendships with leaders of the Mormon faith. A feeling of mutual trust and respect developed. Through this exchange, they offered him the use of the Tabernacle for a High Mass. Father Scanlon with only the most limited of conditions for holding church services accepted with delight. He would hold the Mass on one condition, that the music and text be learned and provided in Latin by the St. George Stake Choir. They agreed. This was an historical moment for St. George and the Tabernacle when this group of miners, far from their homes filed into this beautiful structure, tall in the desert, rimmed by the brilliant red hills. Many townspeople were invited and attended. There was a feeling of warmth and friendship. The choir under the direction of John M. Macfarlane, performed amazingly well in Latin. The Tabernacle had once again proved its value. It wasn't too much later that the silver mine gave out and the silver boom faded away. The people of St. George were sorry to see Father Scanlon go. He had been a devoted friend.

A Place Chosen

In the 1890's the Church was deeply in debt and the nation was in the midst of a depression when Lorenzo Snow became the fifth president of the Church. After many days of wrestling with the problem and after seeking the answer in prayer he was prompted to call a special conference in St. George. Without knowing why he left for St. George, going part way by train and then by carriage. It was a difficult trip for the 86 year old prophet, but the people were thrilled to welcome their leader and the Tabernacle was packed. As he stood at the pulpit, looking frail, he first praised the people for their faith and courage. Then he paused and the congregation became very quiet. They would soon know what had compelled him to make the long trip to St. George. He seemed to gather strength, and then began to speak, "The time has come for every Latter Day Saint to do the will of the Lord and pay his tithing in full. That is the word of the Lord to you and it will be the word of the Lord to every settlement throughout the land. . . " President Snow returned home by carriage to Salt Lake City, giving this same message to every settlement along the way.The saints did respond, the Lord poured out blessings upon them and the debt of the Church was paid. The rains came to save the crops of the folks here, and a wonderful lesson was learned about the value of sacrifice in the eyes of the Lord. Tithing has always been the law given by the Lord to his people.

The Tabernacle Today

Today, history has been preserved in the restoration of this jewel of a pioneer structure which still serves St. George as a cultural center. From around the world visitors are welcome to enjoy its beauty, take tours and hear programs of music and culture. While much of the Tabernacle has undergone other restoration from time to time, through the years, its new re-opening in 1993 shows a building as close to the original as possible. Many believe the St. George Tabernacle is the finest example of design and chapel builder's art in the entire Mormon experience. And the society these stalwart people formed remains strong and vital.

The Prophecy

In the spring of 1861, Brigham Young, president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, looked out over the vast desert that later became the city of St. George and said, "There will yet be built between these volcanic ridges, a city, with spires and towers and steeples, with homes containing many inhabitants."

Today it is clear that the prophecy has been fulfilled. But it was not an easy victory. Those who founded this community endured an arid climate of searing heat and frequent flash floods. They endured the hardship because they knew that a call from a prophet was the same as a call from the Lord, and Brigham Young was a prophet, just as Moses and Abraham were prophets, each called for his own time.

The Call

As the Saints trudged across the great plains on their westward journey they sang, "Come Come Ye Saints. No toil nor labor fear. But with joy, wend your way." Now 309 families sang again as they made the arduous trek southward to the outer boundaries of the territory. They did not fear toil nor labor. They had already toiled to build homes and labored to clear farms in the Salt Lake Valley. Then just as the orchards and fields were beginning to bear, the call came again to settle yet another place. And so they sang as they came, "We'll find a place, Which God for us prepared, Far away in the West." This was a place prepared; a place prepared for the strengthening of a people.

A Place Prepared

Is it a coincidence that Brigham Young sent a weary group of Pioneers to settle in the barren St. George valley in 1861 ? Was it by accident that these early settlers were able to find within near-by distances the gypsum and limestone quarries and the lumber resources that would make possible such majestic structures as the Temple and the Tabernacle.

A look into the Old Testament gives many examples of how the Lord works, moving his people into situations and areas to build spiritual refinement, where they must sacrifice to survive.

Long ago these people had left lush farmlands in the East and midwest. Now they were to face years of struggle in the St. George area. But they found a place prepared with all that was necessary to erect a Temple to their God, and a Tabernacle in which to worship Him. Here was beautiful building rock, timber awaiting the sawmill or the skilled hand-saw, gypsum to make plaster for the interior finish and perhaps most amazing of all, on a red rock knoll just west of here, was a great collection of crucial lime rock scattered over the surface of the hill. Where it came from, no one knew. But without it the plaster would not harden. And there had arrived from England, a man whose family had been lime burners for generations. Strangely, there was just enough. When these structures were completed the supply of lime rock was exhausted. It seemed an unseen hand had provided just what was needed for these sacred buildings.

Did they succeed ? The evidence is clear. Over a hundred years later in a bustling, growing town, the Temple and the Tabernacle are still here, still in use. Churches dot the skyline and people are enjoying a modern lifestyle. But, for the descendants of those early pioneers, there is always a reminder and feeling of gratitude for their sacrifice.

A Three-Fold Purpose

They dealt with the relentless requirements of the wilderness, flooding rivers, grasshoppers and every foot of ditch, carrying water to the land, channeled through the red dirt with a shovel. Yet in the first year they grew 100,000 pounds of cotton, managed to maintain themselves and establish a settlement. But their situation was far from secure. When Brigham Young saw their condition he instituted the building of the Tabernacle.

There was a need for a building. There was a need for employment at which people could earn their sustenance and maintain their dignity with meaningful work and there was a need for a unifying purpose to bond them together as a community. So Brigham Young declared that they should build the Tabernacle, a magnificent structure in New England style, a jewel in the desert which would seat at least 1200 people.

An emotional group of men and women in the frontier town of St. George Utah, only three years from settlement, met together to dedicate the beginning of their much needed Tabernacle. After meeting in make-shift willow boweries, so anxious were they to have a place for worship and other public gatherings, that the minute the basement was completed, they moved in. They offered a dedicatory prayer and for the next eight years this basement became their meeting place.

When finally the building was completed with the Tower in place, the formal dedication was scheduled on the birthday of their beloved prophet, Brigham Young, whose original vision of building a Tabernacle had given this pioneer people so much hope for the future.
Eagerly, they left the basement and with feelings of pride and awe, moved upstairs into the main hall. It was a glorious time. In thirteen years, with almost non-existant cash flow these settlers had created an unbelievable treasure. A building that stands today as a reminder of their amazing courage in the face of almost insurmountable obstacles.

The Glass

Intent upon having the very best for their beloved Tabernacle, they ordered 2244 panes of glass from New York City. It was a daring move. There was little cash flow among the residents of St. George and glass couldn't very well be brought across the plains in a bouncing wagon. Instead, it was transported by ship all the way around South America and into the harbor at Los Angeles. Then they had a serious problem. Before the glass could be released a freight bill of $800 was due. David Cannon, local church leader and well-respected citizen of St. George was assigned the challenge of raising the money to bring the glass from California. As the time of departure arrived he had only $200 in his pocket. Nevertheless, with great faith, he prepared to make the journey, praying that the Lord would open the way. At the same time in the near-by town of Washington, a Danish immigrant named Peter Nielson had saved $600 in gold pieces to enlarge his two-room adobe house. He knew of David Cannon's dilemma, but he had already lent money to a perpetual emigration fund over the years to help new members come to Utah from Europe. They were supposed to pay him back but so far no one had. After spending a sleepless night, and struggling with the problem, Peter arose early, walked the distance from Washington to St. George. Just as the wagons were ready to leave for California, Peter arrived and placed the $600 in gold into David Cannon's hand. An amazing thing then happened to Peter. The money that had been owed him for so many years began to trickle in and soon he had enough to finish his home. Today visitors will notice that many of the original panes are still in place. A closer examination reveals some really wonderful examples of old glass.

The Balcony Incident

One of the most unusual events in the building of the Tabernacle happened after the U-shaped balcony was crafted and firmly in place. Miles Romney, master builder, schooled in English architecture and supervisor of the Tabernacle construction designed two elegant circular staircases. He called them his crowning achievements. They were attached to either side of the foyer-type room at the entrance to the main hall. As the people ascended both staircases the top steps lead onto and were even with the balcony. It seemed a perfect architectural arrangement. There was just one problem. Upon close observation, Brigham Young discovered the balcony was so high, people sitting there could not see the pulpit. Miles Romney reminded the prophet the stairways were permanent and could not be moved. So, Brigham Young recommended the balcony be lowered. And while everyone thought this impossible, Brigham Young surprised them by devising an ingenious plan. This caught the interest of Miles Romney who agreed and complied. Strong men were stationed at each post of the U-shaped balcony. With the use of braces and jacks, each man in unison with the others, using his full physical strength lifted the whole balcony in one piece at one time. The posts were cut off to the desired height by other workers and the balcony was replaced, lower than before. Brigham's plan had worked. Today, Tabernacle audiences who climb up the staircases to their original height will step down an easy 8 steps to the balcony, but that is alright, because now they can see the pulpit just fine.

LDS Church observes the Salt Lake Temple's centennial

By WENDY OGATA
Standard Examiner staff

SALT LAKE CITY — Its rock foundation extends solidly into Utah soil, but LDS Church leaders would have you believe the historic roots of the Salt Lake Temple are more closely bound to heaven.

"Basically, the building itself was seen in vision by Brigham Young and one or two others before it was ever constructed," said Elder Loren C. Dunn, a member of the church's First Quorum of Seventy and chairman of the committee organizing observance of the temple's 100th birthday on April 6.

Dunn

In addition to believing in the heavenly origins of the building's design, Dunn said faithful Mormons believe the Salt Lake Temple fulfills Biblical prophecy.

In the Old Testament, Micah 4:1 talks of the House of the Lord being built in the tops of the mountains. "This is that temple," Dunn said matter of factly.

That temple today, called "the centerpiece of Zion," by Dunn, is a familiar cornerstone of Temple Square, which last year received more than 4 million visitors.

Doreen Maxfield, director of tourism for the Salt Lake Convention and Visitors Bureau, said a national survey performed four years ago by a travel publication placed Temple Square among the top five tourism attractions in the United States, preceded only by Disneyland, Disneyland, the Smithsonian Institute and the Smoky Mountains.

"Temple Square is one of the strong attractions for coming through Salt Lake City," she said. "And the fact that the temple has stood up so well for so many years, you'd never dream it was 100 years old."

That the Salt Lake Temple would be built, may have been a certainty to Mormon pioneers in the 1800s.

That it would be built of granite from Little Cottonwood Canyon was more the result of much discussion on various options.

"They were originally considering building the temple out of adobe," Dunn said.

He said there was also talk of using red butte stone quarried out of Red Butte Canyon on the Salt Lake Valley's east bench.

The pioneers went so far as to build a gravity-driven, wooden-track railroad from the canyon to the temple site to transport the red butte blocks. "They used horse teams to pull it back up to the canyon," Dunn said.

Even today, blocks of red butte stone are visible in the foundation from the interior of the temple, Dunn said.

But discussion on using adobe and red butte stone was tossed aside when granite was discovered in Little Cottonwood Canyon, Dunn said.

Tales of the monumental work involved in cutting the granite from the mountain and transporting it to the temple site are tall tales for the telling among Mormons.

For the uninformed, the story goes that each block, weighing three-and-a-half to five tons, was lashed to an oxen-pulled wagon. "If everything went well, it would take them usually three days per stone to come down the canyon, come around through Sandy and then straight up Main Street.

"Sometimes they were so heavy they'd break the rig and the stone would just be left off to the side because they didn't have the means to pick it up again," he said.

The pioneers dug a canal along the foothills to try floating the granite blocks to a spot closer to the temple site but it didn't work. "When they completed it and ran water into it, by the time they got to Parley's Canyon the water disappeared down into the sandy soil," Dunn said.

Toward the end of construction, a steam railway was used to transport the granite blocks from Little Cottonwood.

The temple took 40 years to build, but Dunn said that was not 40 straight years of work.

For one thing, five years after the start of construction in 1853, the pioneers filled in and covered the completed foundation when they feared they would be driven from the Salt Lake Valley by federal troops.

"They covered up the entire foundation so it looked like just any plowed field," Dunn said.

In 1861, when work was to resume on the temple, Brigham Young noticed cracks in the foundation resulting from small stones and pieces of mortar lying under the blocks.

Rather than risk having the cracks continually plague the temple, Young ordered the workers to start over again from the ground up.

As work on the Salt Lake Temple progressed, the industrious Mormons started and completed three smaller temples in St. George, Logan and Manti. They were also busy constructing the tabernacle on Temple Square and the ZCMI building.

"So it wasn't 40 years of straight work. They'd work on it intermittently during this 40-year period of time," Dunn explained.

With the church's impressive facilities in downtown Salt Lake City today, it is easy to forget the sacrifice needed by the pioneers to build the temple.

He told of one pioneer's journal entry about attending the temple ground breaking ceremony on Feb. 14, 1853, wearing only rags to protect his feet from frozen mud and slush, a pair of pants made out of his wife's calico skirt, a thin calico shirt and a straw hat.

"These were all the clothes I had. It was go that way or stay at home," the journal read.

Mormon folklore says it was Brigham Young's prophetic power that prompted him to inexplicably direct architects to leave empty shafts running the height of the temple, only to later have them used for elevators.

Asked about the tale, Dunn smiled and said, "We've heard that too, but I've never been able to authenticate it."

He said his understanding is that one of the two architects who worked on the temple project is responsible for including elevators in the design.

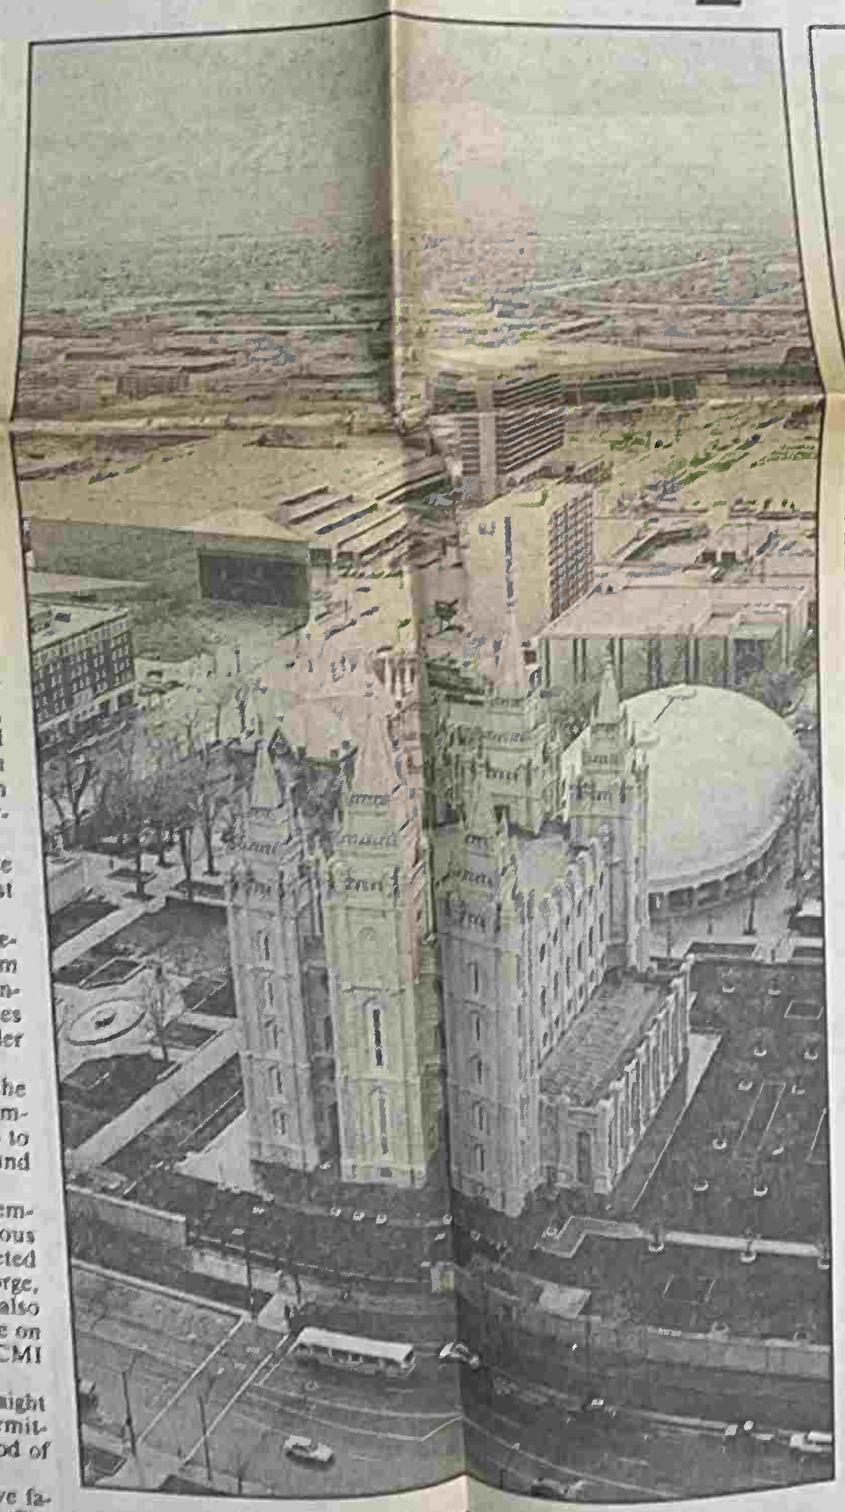
The centennial

Key events associated with the 100th anniversary of the Salt Lake Temple:

- March 27, opening of an exhibit at the Museum of Church History and Art, 45 N. West Temple, Salt Lake City, on construction of the Salt Lake Temple.
- April 3, premiere of "The Mountain of the Lord," a 72-minute film about the temple's construction to be aired on KSL Channel 5 at 10pm. Between General Conference sessions. It will also show on KBYU Channel 11 at 7 p.m. April 4.
- April 4, a special program during the Mormon Tabernacle Choir's weekly "Music and the Spoken Word."



The Salt Lake Temple remains the centerpiece of a city that continues to grow and receive worldwide recognition.

Distinguishing features of the temple

Salt Lake Temple points of interest:

- The temple's well-known granite construction was at one point proposed to be adobe or red butte stone.
- The temple's six main spires represent the presidencies of the Melchizedek or higher priesthood, and the Aaronic or lower priesthood. The eastern spires, built slightly taller than the spires on the west, represent the three members of the Melchizedek presidency, which is also the church's governing First Presidency, while the ones on the west represent the Aaronic priesthood presidency.
- The golden Angel Moroni on the top-most pinnacle of the temple is 12½-feet tall and was sculpted by non-Mormon Cyrus Dallin at the request of then-church President Wilford Woodruff. The angel's trumpet is 6 feet long.
- The earthstones, moonstones, sunstones and star stones on the temple are representative of its purpose as a place where heaven and earth can come together and also the different degrees of afterlife glory believed in by church members.
- The Big Dipper on the facade of the temple was designed to point toward the North Star, symbolic of the lost finding themselves in the priesthood.
- Around the temple are 50 moon stones displaying the cycle of a lunar month.
- The all-seeing eye on the temple, beneath the dedicatory inscription, is a symbol of God's omnipresent nature and divine protection.

Americans turning to angels for hope

TERRY MATTINGLY
Scripps Howard News Service

In the Bible, angels often announce their presence with three simple words: "Be not afraid."

Glimpses of eternity seem to have been terrifying to human eyes, even if the angelic figures brought good news.

It's a long way from the mysterious and disturbing visions of the Apostle John and other mystics to the comfortable stories about angels and eternal life that are selling at bookstores and theaters. Today's angels offer pats on the back, not troubling flashes of divine guidance.

"What we are seeing are the angels of pop psychology. They come down from heaven to help us feel better about ourselves," said Peter Kreeft, professor of philosophy at Boston College and author of "Everything You Ever Wanted to Know About Heaven."

"These angels inspire neither awe nor terror. ... They are so helpful, so comforting. These are some of the last words that the Bible would use to describe an angel: an eternal being of pure truth and good."

Recent books such as "Angel Letters" and "A Book of Angels" have made the best-seller lists. Meanwhile, polls indicate that a large majority of Americans believe in heaven and most believe in hell. As a rule, people believe they're going to heaven, no matter how they live.

Millions of Americans yearn for a non-judgmental faith, a ticket to heaven with no strings attached, said Kreeft.

"Obviously, the advantage of this way of looking at things is that with no sin and no hell, people think they can live however they please, and when they die they'll ooze into some kind of eternal laboratory for personal growth," he said.

But pop culture's visions of eternal life also show that Americans aren't satisfied with a strictly secular, purely scientific view of life. Many people have flirted with the New Age movement. The current angel fad offers the appearance of Christianity, with few of its troubling doctrines.

"Nature abhors a vacuum and, after years of a culture that majored in nihilism and despair, people want to believe in some kind of vision that offers hope," said Kreeft. "The media ... make it clear that Christianity is the one option that can't be taken seriously. So people are left with a kind of New Age, Yuppie version of Buddhism to fall back on."

The goal is self-help, not salvation. People who see themselves as basically good — although perhaps in need of help and comfort — will yearn to see kinder, gentler angels.

"If you see yourself as a sinner, then perhaps a visitation by an angel would be terrifying," said Kreeft. "If you know you that have sinned, then the appearance of an angel might be like a visit by a surgeon to the bedside of a person who has cancer. The surgeon is there to do good. But getting rid of the cancer might hurt."

A FOUR YEAR OLD... little boy often begged his mother to wear a certain dress, he particularly liked. Just for him, she did. It was white with big, black polka-dots. Priest reaches out to serve deaf parishioners

By ELLEN O'BRIEN
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

The Rev. Brian O'Neill was saying Mass. The parish chapel at St. Rose of Lima Catholic Church in Haddon Heights, N.J., was nearly full, a long, narrow, double room where the walls were a dun brick and stained-glass windows rose from floor to ceiling on either side of the altar.

He was wearing a green chasuble over his alb, the green a symbol of hope. Below the wooden crucifix, his hands moved, stopped, moved, sweeping upward, outward, contracting toward his heart, tapping his chest, and then sweeping upward again.

Every gesture meant something. Father O'Neill was saying Mass for the deaf.

He was delivering the day's Gospel. His fingers curled and straightened, listing the New Testament blessings known as the Beatitudes, punctuating the air delicately and exactly: ""His disciples gathered around Him, and He began to teach them. 'Happy are those who know they are spirit-poor. The kingdom of heaven belongs to them. ... Happy are those who do what God requires. They will be satisfied fully. ... Happy are the merciful. ... Happy are the pure in heart. ...'"

If we're lucky, we find our life's work.

If we're luckier still, and the work is important enough, it tracks us down and corners us.

That is what happened to O'Neill, although he does not consider it luck; he considers it grace.

"I thought I'd be a policeman," he remembered. "Or a fireman."

Instead, he became the first priest to devote a full-time ministry to deaf and hearing-impaired Catholics in the Camden Diocese, driving throughout southern New Jersey like an old-fashioned circuit-rider.

This isn't anything "he" had intended. Certainly, growing up, strictly working-class, he never expected to become a priest at all.

He was trying to explain how a high school dropout and ex-Marine wound up ordained and ministering in American Sign Language — ASL — in a region that stretches from Camden to Atlantic City.

"They'll accept me, over all these years," he said of the 320 people who form the core of his South Jersey mission work. "But I'm not deaf," he said. "I mean, I'm a part of the deaf community. I'm not a part of the deaf culture ..."

His first assignment in South Jersey was as an assistant pastor at Sacred Heart parish in South Camden — which is where he encountered the event that changed his life.

Watching a summer volleyball game in a nearby housing project, the young priest spotted two boys, not quite 10, fighting by a tree; one was trying to hit the other with a rock. When he broke up the fracas, he discovered that one of the boys, Vance Harmon, was profoundly deaf. "He just proceeded to look at me. ... I just wanted him to know I was a friend, that's all. ..."

He invited the boy to visit him at his rectory: "That night was it, when he started to come, and I started to think, 'I wonder who's giving them sacraments, who's preaching to them ...' " While O'Neill talked, forgetting himself in the recollection of how his interest in the boy became his life's work, his hands unobtrusively began to form the words on his lap, in sign. "It was the grace of God. I'm convinced of it. Absolutely convinced," he said. "God was touching me."

And so O'Neill got in touch with Father Anthony Russo, a Redemptorist priest who runs the Philadelphia Archdiocese's ministry to the deaf, and asked to learn ASL.

The first thing he learned was the Mass.

He learned it by rote, sign by sign, before he was able to hold even the simplest conversation in ASL, in order to begin his Catholic ministry at its heart.

The first Mass was in 1972, the first wedding was in 1973.

He built his "congregation" individual by individual, seeking out baptized Catholics who had never seen a Mass in their own language: "Someone would give me a name of somebody, and I would drive down there." He obtained an assistant, Joann Burns, and the list of congregants grew.

Temple

From 7A

man said a story that has been verified indicates Wilford Woodruff, a church leader, dreamt of a throng of people milling around the temple, apparently unable to get in.

In the dream, Brigham Young handed Woodruff the key to the temple and instructed him to open the door.

Dunn said Woodruff at the time couldn't understand why the key wasn't given to John Taylor, who was senior to him in apostolic authority.

The explanation comes in the fact that Taylor ended up dying in 1887, six years before the temple dedication. It was Woodruff who was president and prophet of the church when the temple was dedicated on April 6, 1893, Dunn said.

A year before the dedication, tens of thousands attended a ceremony in which the capstone under the Angel Moroni statue was set into place.

Under the capstone is a box in which is sealed, still today, copies of scriptural and other theological works, photographs of church authorities and an engraved tablet giving a brief history of the temple's construction.

The Salt Lake Tabernacle was completed long before the walls of the temple began to climb.

The foundation of the temple is shown here, several years into the 40-year project.

If you want to spend some time with your children, just tell them

DEAR ABBY

Abigail Van Buren

Universal Press Syndicate

DEAR ABBY: This is in response to "Hurt" — the couple who had done so much for their children but were never invited to their homes.

The next time your children ask, "What would you like for your birthday, Christmas or anniversary?" reply, "I would like to come to your home for a meal, cookout, or to spend the day."

I know this has worked because I asked my mother the same question, and I was surprised to get this reply. All she wanted was to spend the day with me and only me.

Because of this, I have set aside several days each year to travel or just be with my mother. This has been a most wonderful blessing for me. The pleasure I gave her by just spending time with her has been multiplied many times in the pleasure she has given me.

The pleasure we have enjoyed will last throughout her lifetime — and mine.

— (Mrs.) Helen L. Lindler, Chapin, S.C.

DEAR MRS. LINDLER: Thank you for reminding us that time is priceless, and spending time with someone is indeed a precious gift.

DEAR ABBY: After reading about how Mrs. Dow's name was constantly mispronounced, I was reminded of my own situation. I came to Canada from Holland in 1954 as an adult. I had to learn English. The words with "ow" were a headache to figure out how to pronounce. Examples:

1. The words POWER MOWER; what would we get if MOWER were pronounced like POWER sounds?

2. When introduced at a meeting, a person takes a BOW; but a gift looks pretty when decorated with a BOW.

3. We KNOW: The wind does BLOW, you can go with the FLOW, or lay LOW.

Tired? Just go SLOW.

A baby will GROW. When happy, you GLOW.

Someone conceited will CROW.

A car stuck in the SNOW needs a TOW.

A person who's angry needs things to THROW.

Another name for a movie is a SHOW.

There are many more, but enough for this ROW.

4. A farmer uses a PLOW, milks a COW, perhaps owns a SOW.

How they sound like the name DOW.

Wow?! I had better stop NOW!

— Rita Hoogland, Simcoe, Ontario, Canada

DEAR ABBY: Reading your column about the shocked woman who believed it was immoral for a male doctor to treat a female, and vice versa, put me in mind of this limerick. Sorry, I don't know who wrote it, but I think it's hilarious.

— Clarence C. Speller, Milford, Ohio

DEAR MR. SPELLER: So do I. Thanks for sending it:

Designer is calling it quits

The Associated Press

Adolfo, whose fashions have graced Nancy Reagan and Betsy Bloomingdale, is calling it quits on designing to concentrate on his licensing business.

PEOPLE

He said he'll miss his clients.

"They became like part of my family," Adolfo said in Friday's New York Times. "I never socialized with them — I don't go to parties — but I did enjoy very much the confidence and trust and help they always gave me."

The 60-year-old, Cuban-born Adolfo Sardina, who has never used his family name professionally, licenses his name for royalties to manufacturers of men's wear, luggage, handbags, shoes, jogging suits, furs, sportswear, perfume and hats.

PRINCESS MAY BE PREGNANT: Princess Anne may or may not be expecting a baby.

Buckingham Palace wouldn't confirm or deny a report Friday in the Daily Express that the princess apparently is pregnant.

The writer of the tabloid story, columnist Ross Benson, said he based the observation on circumstantial evidence.

Anne's husband, Navy Cmdr. Timothy Laurence, told friends he wants a child, Benson said. Benson also reported that Anne felt faint while shopping recently and isn't riding regularly anymore.

"When a member of the royal family becomes pregnant, an announcement is made at a time of their choosing," a palace statement said.

CHARLES MEETS WITH KOHL: Prince Charles met privately with German Chancellor Helmut Kohl on Friday before reciving an award for his environmental efforts.

The two met for more than an hour at Kohl's office. A government spokesman said the talk was of a "private character" but covered international affairs, particularly world environmental policy.

The international group Artists for Ecology honored the British crown prince with an award to be given later Friday at the government's palatial, mountaintop guest house.

Opening lead — six of hearts.

Some contracts look impossible to make, but a tenacious declarer does not concede defeat before giving them the old college try. Take this deal where South winds up in three notrump after East has opened with one spade. West leads a heart to East's ace, and a heart is returned to South's king.

Prospects are certainly dim at this point. Declarer sees eight tricks, with very little chance for a ninth. It seems that the only possibility is to cash the ace of spades, hoping to find West with the singleton jack and in that way acquire a fourth spade trick.

The chance of West's having the singleton jack is very remote, but if this were the only chance South had, he'd have to play for it.

However, there is a much more promising possibility: namely, that West started with the singleton eight or nine of spades, in which case a fourth spade trick can be established with careful play.

Accordingly, South cashes the king of clubs at trick three followed by the jack, which he overtakes with the queen. He then leads the ten of spades.

East is forced to cover with the jack and South plays the ace, catching West's eight. Now the ten of clubs to the ace is followed by a low spade from dummy. When East follows low, declarer finesses the seven.

Virtue is rewarded when South cashes the queen of spades and then leads the carefully preserved six of clubs to dummy's eight in order to cash trick number nine, the king of spades.

Admittedly, this line of play requires a certain degree of luck as well as meticulous planning, but nonetheless it's all highly logical. And, after all, bridge is a logical game.
